S&P 500®, Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, Bloomberg U.S. Aggregate Bond Index, and MSCI World Index are unmanaged groups of securities used as general measures of stock and bond performance. It is not possible to invest directly in an index. Calculations assume dividends and capital gains are reinvested and do not include any expenses.

Asset allocation and diversification do not assure or guarantee better performance, cannot eliminate the risk of investment losses, and do not protect against an overall declining market. Fees associated with a fund-of-funds may be higher than with other funds. An investment in the Fund is subject to the risks associated with the underlying funds including fixed income investing. Fixed-income securities are subject to risks including credit risk, interest rate risk, counterparty risk, prepayment risk, extension risk, valuation risk, and liquidity risk. Investments in small-and medium-sized companies present additional risks such as increased volatility because their earnings are less predictable, their share price more volatile, and their securities less liquid than larger or more established companies. Investing internationally, globally, or in emerging markets exposes investors to additional risks and expenses such as changes in currency rates, foreign taxation, differences in auditing and other financial standards not associated with investing domestically.

The ability of each fund to achieve its objective depends largely on the performance of the underlying funds in which it invests, a pro rata portion of whose operating expenses the fund bears. Each underlying fund's performance, in turn, depends on the particular securities in which that underlying fund invests. Accordingly, each fund is subject indirectly to all of the risks associated with its underlying funds, as stated in the prospectus.

Mutual funds are subject to market risk, including loss of principal. Past performance is not indicative of future results.
