There's never been a more important time to focus on your company's social impact. As events and crises around the globe demand more of your attention, stakeholders at all levels now expect companies to be leaders in taking meaningful action.

The right technology partner will help you do that. Not only can it be a game changer for your CSR initiatives, it can bolster employee engagement and your bottom line. Here's how:

Attract and retain talent

Millennials and Gen Zers are more likely to support and work for brands who have a clear social purpose, and engaging employees in giving and volunteering can reduce a company’s turnover rate by 57%.

Achieve better business outcomes

Investing in CSR can increase market value by 6% and sales revenue by 20%.

Build a culture of purpose

Enable your employees to support the causes they are passionate about and provide more ways to do good, creating a sense of purpose that boosts engagement.

Earn higher brand recognition

86% of consumers say they'd buy from a purpose-driven brand, and 74% say they'd be more likely to tell others to buy from the brand.

Make a positive impact

Mobilize your people quickly to respond to the needs of your community and crises around the world. Give people concrete ways to take action and make a positive impact in ordinary and extraordinary times.
Top Challenges for CSR Leaders and Employees

Low program engagement
One of the major problems CSR teams face is that the response just isn't there when they try to engage their people in doing good. There might be multiple reasons for that:

• Inconsistency — Offering just a few initiatives a year makes it difficult to build a culture of doing good.

• Top-down initiatives — A limited number of causes are supported, and only leadership gets a say in what they are.

• Lack of agility — An inability to respond quickly in a crisis can hinder a program’s effectiveness.

Limited time and resources
Running a CSR program can be time-intensive and demand a lot of resources. Communicating volunteer opportunities, tracking hours, ensuring eligible donations are matched — it’s an overwhelming amount of manual work. If you aren’t supported by the right technology, it can be a full-time job, and then some.

Lack of accessibility
As remote work becomes the norm across industries, employees are more dispersed than ever. The distance can make it difficult to build culture and engage people on important CSR initiatives. Programs often cater to in-house employees and serve people in only one location, language or currency.

No way to measure impact
Without a formal program in place and the right technology to support you, it can be difficult to calculate the ROI on your efforts. And without measurable statistics, getting consistent, enthusiastic buy-in from leadership is another barrier.

5 Key Capabilities to Look For in Your CSR Solution

1. An engaging and inclusive platform
   Increase program participation by offering your people more ways to make an impact through giving, volunteering and taking positive actions.

   Provide access to a world of nonprofits for your employees and enable them to create their own giving and volunteering opportunities. This helps your employees feel like your CSR program is built for them, creating a sense of purpose that boosts engagement.

   Connect with your global workforce by making your program available in multiple languages, locations and currencies.

2. Technology that scales
   Build a future-proof program that can grow and change along with your company.

   Automate time-consuming tasks to ensure the manual work doesn’t increase as your program expands.

   Look for a solution that can seamlessly incorporate new features into your program when the time is right, like Volunteer Champions, incentives or international capabilities.

Did you know?

Volunteering and donating go hand-in-hand, with 70% of volunteers also donating
3 Safe and secure delivery of funds
It’s important to ensure your donation dollars are going to vetted nonprofits, with as few handoffs as possible.

When researching CSR technology, look for the platform that safeguards your program’s data with industry-leading security and compliance practices.

4 Robust, real-time reporting
Measuring and showcasing your program’s results are important to getting buy-in and support for your CSR initiatives from key stakeholders. Look for a platform that has robust reporting capabilities, allowing you to keep track of participants, volunteer hours and total donation volume.

Also, consider if the platform is able to track real-time campaign participation and program growth over time and provide benchmarks against similar companies.

5 A collaborative partner
It’s about more than just the technology. When researching CSR technology, ensure you’ll be supported by a knowledgeable team through your entire purpose journey and, specifically, the design, execution and management of your program.

Also, check if the platform offers ready-made content, campaign kits and crisis response to important issues. These resources will help you act fast and provide timely, relevant and accessible content to your people — and keep your program engagement high.
